WORK IN PROGRESS

Air Pollution and Workplace Safety: Evidence from Dust Precipitation Events
(with Benjamin Hattemer)

Our paper presents the first estimates of the economy-wide effect of air pollution on work accidents. We use administrative data on the universe of work accidents reported in Spain. We match municipality-by-day accident counts to information on local particulate matter ambient concentrations and weather variables. We obtain causal estimates by exploiting quasi-random variation in air pollution stemming from dust precipitation. Our estimates imply that an average day of dust precipitation induces a 1.5 percent increase in work accidents. Dust precipitation's impact is more pronounced in days with high anthropogenic air pollution. We find differences in the impact of dust across worker groups based on gender and age. Males and prime-aged workers (25-49 years old) experience the most significant effects.

Fixed-term Contracts and Workplace Safety (with Josep Amer)

Workers under fixed-term contracts have significantly higher accident rates than permanent employees. We use administrative data from Italy and Spain to identify how much of the differential on work accident rates between stems from a contractual effect.

Bank Offices and Household Portfolio Choices (with Jin Cao, Kasper Roszbac and Marina Sanchez del Villar)

We investigate the relationship between temporary job contracts and workplace safety. The aim of this project is to identify how much of the differential on work accident rates between temporary and permanent workers stems from a purely contractual effect.
